A PRAGMATIC AND THEOLOGICAL EVALUATION OF MANAGEMENT BY OBJECTIVES IN SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CONFERENCE ADMINISTRATION

Year: 1980

Since the mid 1970s the Seventh-day Adventist Church has become increasingly involved in management by objectives and has adapted and applied it with varying degrees of success in conferences and churches. Very little overt pragmatic and theological motivations have accompanied the promotion of this movement toward the use of management by objectives in the church. Leaders have simply proceeded with it on the apparent assumption...

...be equally effective in an ecclesiastical situation.

While the thesis of this study contends that management by objectives is compatible with a Seventh-day Adventist understanding of the nature and mission...

...foundations on which it may be allowed to stand. An investigation of the application of management by objectives in the Wisconsin Conference of Seventh-day Adventists demonstrates how needful it is...

...order to allow it to serve its purpose with integrity.

The most important dynamics of management by objectives are identified as missional intentionality, responsible democracy, a wise use of authority, and...

...conclusion that is reached at this point suggests that a more theologically precise modification of management by objectives would be ministry by objectives. Such a designation seems to be more in...

...the biblical perspective of servanthood and service in Christian leadership, yet does not require that management by objectives become untrue to the intent of its pragmatic design. Regarded in this manner...
...setting instead of the reverse. Theology is retained in its commanding place in the church. Management by objectives functions in an "afterward" and subservient capacity as an adaptable medium through which...

...its structures. When kept in this relationship, and viewed from both a pragmatic and theological point of view, management by objectives and the nature and mission of the Seventh-day Adventist Church are compatible.
